 wa. 280 403 7 1945

- (10) Location of Blue (friendly) outpost.
- (11) Contemplated movements of the command during patrol's absence, if any.
- (12) Cause patrol leader to set his watch with commander's.

Upon receipt of the orders, the patrol leader should request that he be given, or at least permitted to see, a map of the terrain over which he is to operate. From the map he makes necessary notes and sketches for his guidance.

PLAN OF THE PATROL LEADER

Having received his orders the patrol leader's first duty is to prepare his plan for carrying them out. Plans laid in advance must necessarily be elastic. It is impossible to foresee everything, especially the enemy's actions. Unexpected obstacles or facilities may be encountered. Plans must accordingly be modified to meet actual conditions, but it will seldom be either wise or necessary to abandon entirely a well laid plan.

While the plans of the leader usually look well into the future and cover the general operation of the patrol as a whole, the orders the leader gives to his subordinates are usually intended for immediate execution. Even though it be unnecessary to modify his general plans, details of execution can seldom be foreseen. The leader of a small patrol can exercise immediate control and give necessary orders from time to time as he progresses. Before starting he tells his men, and especially his second in command, the mission of the patrol and so much of his plans for the future as is necessary to insure intelligent cooperation by all.

THE MISSION

The first step in the leader's is to interpret properly and understand fully his mission. The leader must put his mission into his own words. For example: "I am to move 3 miles east on the Baltimore Pike and look for signs of the enemy."

It might be supposed that there could be no possibility of misunderstanding or forgetting so simple and definite a mission. But let us suppose that after proceeding for one mile the patrol leader meets a friendly farmer who says: "There is no enemy on or near this road between here and my place, which is 10 miles east." The patrol leader says to himself: "That is what I wanted to know," and returns at once to his commander. When he makes his report his commander severely censures him for accepting the word of an unknown man instead of finding out the facts for himself, as he was ordered to do. The patrol leader has failed to carry out his mission. He should have ascertained for himself if the farmer's report of the enemy was correct, up to the three mile point east on the Baltimore Pike. Then; if the farmer's information had proved to be correct, on the patrol leader's return to his commander, he should have reported the meeting and conversation with the farmer. Information of that nature would be valuable to the commander as contributing to and supporting other evidence of the enemy's location.

If the commander cannot depend on his patrols he cannot gain the information he needs. It is for him to decide and to order the mission of each patrol, and it is the duty of the patrol leader to carry out his assigned mission and even in friendly territory not be led astray or diverted by anything he may happen to learn from inhabitants.
